Delay of a Client's Cancer Diagnosis Results in Substantial Confidential Settlement

The Marasco & Nesselbush Personal Injury team obtained a confidential settlement in a medical negligence case that involved a Rhode Island woman whose breast cancer diagnosis was delayed almost two years.

Our client felt a lump in the upper quadrant of her right breast. Her doctor believed the mammograms showed normal breast tissue and recommended a follow-up in six months. As instructed, she followed-up six months later with another radiologist, and again was told her mammogram and ultrasound showed that nothing changed. The lump she felt was probably benign. Again, our client was asked to follow-up and was advised that no immediate surgical action was needed.

Our client's OB-GYN was given copies of these reports and neglected to review the films. The OB-GYN examined our client, noted the lump's size and directed our client to follow-up again in six months. The result from this follow-up appointment was devastating.

The mammogram, ultrasound and additional tests conducted at this appointment demonstrated a 1.8 cm mass, revealing breast cancer in the form of invasive ductal carcinoma. To treat her cancer, our client went through a prolonged traumatic experience resulting in a segmental mastectomy and many postsurgical complications. Additionally, she underwent a second surgery to remove ischemic skin that was causing a lack of blood supply. She was then treated with six months of adjuvant chemotherapy and two months of radiation.

While undergoing treatments, our client questioned if there was a delay in her diagnosis, and if so, what could be done. Another attorney heard her story and referred her to Marasco & Nesselbush. After accepting the case, Attorney Mark Grimm, Legal Assistant Sara Squillace, and the Marasco & Nesselbush Personal Injury team took action.

This was a complex medical negligence case that took years to resolve. Over this time, the team gathered hundreds of medical records and medical opinions including ultrasound films and pathology reports. With the assistance of radiologist and oncology experts, Attorney Mark Grimm and the team determined that our client should have had a biopsy performed when the lump was first detected. After filing suit, we demonstrated that our client's quality of life was diminished due to her delayed diagnosis. If her cancer was treated at an earlier stage, the long-standing damages would have been avoided.

Our client ultimately was compensated with a significant confidential settlement and we are pleased that it has been more than five years that she has gone without a recurrence. "Unfortunately, radiology reports and ultrasound films are improperly read or even ignored at times. When this happens, treatment is delayed, and results can be devastating," said firm partner Joseph Marasco. "Typically, we see patients enduring more invasive procedures like mastectomies and having an increased risk of recurrence."

The Marasco & Nesselbush team is proud to advocate for those suffering from medical negligence. We believe it is an honor to provide this legal care because it improves the quality of life of our clients, ensures that negligent care givers are held accountable, and leads to improved medical care. M&N Helps a Cancer Survivor

The Marasco & Nesselbush team recently obtained a favorable decision after a hearing with the Social Security Administration (SSA) for a client who was suffering from cancer.

Our client was a hardworking restaurant employee who had a 20-year work history in the industry. She was diagnosed with breast cancer and everything changed. She consulted with her doctors to develop the best course of action to treat her cancer which included surgery, chemotherapy, and radiation.

Her treatments left her too fatigued to lift heavy objects and too nauseous to get back to a normal work schedule. She turned to the SSA for help and filed for Social Security Disability Benefits. After paying into the Social Security system for 20 years, her application was denied.

She was referred to Marasco & Nesselbush by a community organization and we began working on her case. Attorney Noah Zimmerman, Legal Assistant Sheena Meloni and our team requested a hearing and built an extensive case file consisting of medical documents, work history details, and written statements from her doctors supporting her disability application.

"Cases like this one should be approved on the initial application. I believe, at times, the SSA has difficulty accurately evaluating pain and fatigue-based restrictions in functioning caused by chemotherapy and radiation", says Attorney Zimmerman. "Unfortunately, in the first two application stages, the fate of a case is based on treatment notes alone."

Attorney Zimmerman added, "We were successful at the hearing despite the earlier denials. This is because the hearing was our team's first opportunity to present a compelling case backed by medical evidence and testimony demonstrating just how debilitating the effects of cancer treatments can be."

The Marasco & Nesselbush team is proud and grateful to have achieved a favorable decision on behalf of such a deserving client.
